Creating An FYE Course For High-Risk Students: Curriculum, Sequencing & Interaction Tuesday, October 9 ~ 3:00-4:00pm (Eastern)

Once the live date has passed, this training will be available on demand.

Overview

This webinar will focus on the planning and execution of a freshman success course for any student—but with the high-risk student as the target population. Potentially every student in this class may be prone to derailment and failure for factors in their histories for which we will never know. This webinar will first discuss a needs-analysis for such a student, in terms of academic success in their other courses and in terms of retaining the student into the second year. This webinar will then set forth a program design based on those needs and the critical order of presentation for those design elements. Finally, this webinar will suggest specifics for successful interaction with these students, based on a case management approach. Put fifty first-year instructors in a room to determine best practice for all of that, and you will find that reaching a consensus may take some time. Veteran instructors with years of experience, newbie instructors armed with current research, and the disciplines of our individual backgrounds create discordant lenses. This webinar will synthesize the elements suggested for consistency across sections.

Objectives:

- Identify and improve student-learning outcomes for this course
- Discover an innovative approach to teaching this course—up front and throughout the semester
- Explore strategies, theories, case studies, and analytics associated with this course
- Develop ideas for how to adapt this approach to your individual needs

Who Should Attend?

- Administration investigating beginning or improving a freshman success program
- Instructors and student instructors working with freshman success program
- Faculty and staff working with high-risk students
- Any educator interested in learning more about transforming the first year experience for students

Speaker(s)

M.E McWilliams / Director of Academic Assistance & Resource Center (AARC)

Stephen F. Austin State University, Nacogdoches, Texas

The beginning of college marks a clear delineation between the past—both the achievement and the regret of it—and the future—both the fear and hope of it. It is a moment perhaps best symbolized by the blank page, upon which each student will begin to write a new story. This course will greatly influence that story!

M.E. McWilliams is the director of the award-winning Academic Assistance and Resource Center (AARC) at Stephen F. Austin State University, Nacogdoches, Texas. For this center, she is responsible for over 260 peer tutors who offer innovative and collaborative learning to 6,000 clients who collectively accumulate 75,000 visits annually. M.E. is a veteran workshop presenter and a teacher in the higher-ed classroom for over thirty years. She has served on a number of first-year experience committees and co-wrote the proposal for the newly established Student Success Center at SFA. She has taught the SFA freshman success course since 1997 and has been actively involved in the provisional program of SFA since 1995. She has served as an external reviewer for a number of other learning centers. M.E. completed her English degree at Baylor University and her masters in English at Stephen F. Austin State University. Her approach to presenting and teaching is mixed and unexpected, like her interests: fishing, football, bowling, basketball, art, and ballet.
